With the closing of the FIS Alpine World Ski championships in Cortina on Sunday, the torch for the organization of the next World championships will now be passed to the resorts of Courchevel and Méribel, which will host the competition from February 6 to 19, 2023.

After Chamonix (1937, 1962) and Val d'Isère (2009), Alpine World Ski championships will be held in the French Alps for the fourth time in a century. In a break with tradition, the women's and men's competitions will be shared equitably between two venues, with an exceptionally steep and spectacular slope (Eclipse) for the men's races and the intention to ensure the event is a wonderful celebration for athletes and spectators, alike.

During the closing ceremony, Michel Vion, President of the Organizing committee of Courchevel Méribel and President of the French Ski Federation, received the flag symbolizing the handover from the FIS. He said: "Cortina has organized incredible World championships despite this situation. For its part, Courchevel Méribel has already started working hard to host the 2023 edition. Courchevel Méribel is ready to welcome the world of skiing.

We all hope that the situation will be easier and that we will be able to enjoy great competitions but also moments of intense and popular celebrations.”

Perrine Pelen, Managing Director of the organizing committee of Courchevel Meribel 2023 also expressed her views: “We invite skiing fans from France and around the globe to share the thrills and excitement of this great occasion with the athletes and with the whole mountain community. We are confident that everyone — athletes, spectators, journalists, volunteers and television viewers — will enjoy this great event to the full and take away enduring memories of outstanding racing, magnificent scenery and joyous celebration”
